features

See youse later: teaching English literacy to Australians 3

by Rosemary McKenry

For literacy and ESL practitioners, there is often a balance to find between upholding standard English and assuring students that their language and culture is respected.

Work Ready with a Head Start 6

by Jodie Matthews

In south Gippsland, local employment and educational organisations joined a community house and the local council to help young people get the basic training to find casual retail and hospitality work.

“What you do first is get them into groups”: project-based learning and teaching employability skills 11

by Martyn Brogan

The success of project-based learning depends on the development of effective group work skills. Or do group work skills develop through project-based activities?

What do I do next?: literacy for a sustainable community 17

by Maree Keating

When retrenched workers went into partnership with their union, local employment organisations and TAFE, they removed some misconceptions, and found new pathways and new jobs as well.

regulars

Practical Matters 20

Lynne Matheson finds self-publishing to be the perfect model of project-based learning.

Open Forum 24

From humble beginnings in 1990, Jenny Poon and the Traralgon Neighbourhood House now offer award-standard computer classes. In Melbourne, Lynne Matheson reports on the VALBEC conference.

Policy Update 27

Adult, Community and Further Education has set up Circles of Professional Research Practice to maximise the practical benefits of high-level research and support the implementation of the ministerial statement at regional and local levels.

Foreign Correspondence 29

China, land of a billion stories—and here are as many as Snezana Dabic could fit into 3000 words.

Beside the Whiteboard 34

Fran O’Neill talks to Lynne Matheson about the old days with Fine Print and her years with VALBEC.
